Education

Freie Universität Berlin Ph.D. Political Science 2019–2022 (exp.)

Dissertation: Partisan Polarization in Congressional Nominations: How Ideological & Factional Primaries Influence Candidate Positions

Committee: Christian Lammert (chair), Sean M. Theriault, Max Steinhardt, Rachel M. Blum

The thesis first documents the changing dynamics of U.S. congressional primary competition between 2006 and 2020, namely, the proliferation of ideological and factional contests. I then analyze the impact of ideological and factional primaries on candidate positions in terms of the selective (voter) effect, between-election adaptative effect, and within-election adaptative effect. I demonstrate that voters do not systematically reward non-centrist positioning even in primaries about ideological and factional differences, but that candidates often behave as if they do, adapting their positions both between and within election cycles.

Freie Universität Berlin MA North American Studies (1.0) 2017–2019

The MA study focused primarily within the discipline of political science, with additional courses in cultural studies and interdisciplinary subjects. The thesis focused on the topic of polarization in the U.S. Congress and received the highest grade of 1.0.

University of Exeter BA Hons Politics (2:1) 2005–2008

The BA program gave a broad introduction to the discipline of political science, the dissertation focused on media representations of the U.S. presidency and received a 1st.
